TWO REPUBLICS.

This year of our Lord, eighteen him dred and eighty-nine, is made memorable by the centennial celebration of usbering upon the stage of the world two nations under new principles of government. Re publics in name had existed before; to monarchy and despotism had over an ngain wearied the patience of men and taxed their forbearance beyond ending ance. But in the nominal republics sub stituted for discarded forms, the voice of the people was as little beeded, then rights and their grievances as little cor sidered as under their accustomed form of oppression. Privileged classes and olligarchie combinations succeeded to al the powers and immunities that has been wrested from kings; and the but dens of tyranny were not lightened be cause they had been transferred to other shoulders.

The principles which underlaid the American and French revolutions has different origin. With the former there was inherent instinct for free institutions an intolence of personal government, as earnest purpose for participation in puls lie affairs, a fierce demand for constitu tional limitations, a fixed resolution to exact, maintain and defend them, and step by step to wrest from the original source of power more and more of privi lege and power for the people, and tena cionsly to hold on to whatever wa guined. The contests of the parliamen with Charles I, ending in his overthrow and that of monarchy, led very nearly up to the establishment of a republic is England, postponed to a far future b cause the whole nation was unready for the change, and because religious bigotr and intolerance, and the ferocious despo ism of military rule presented republicar ism in a phase hardly less annuable or to erable than the monarchy it had super seded. But there were good seeds among the rubbish and the rums. Transplante to America, they germunated and flour ished in the isolation of the wilderness when there was the amplest personal lil erty of action, full freedom of though and speech, and practical experience what man is capable of doing with the responsibilities of self-government. Lib erty had its tull training when it grew unrestricted; and when the America constitution was adopted, and the wheels of government set in motion, the machine moved off with steadiness, with barmony in all its movements, and strength proportioned to the burden had upon it. One hundred years has provethe skill and wisdom at the structure and another hundred years may find it still unimpaired, and going on to increase in strength and grandent

For the French revolution there had been no schooling in the science of government, no training in those principles which gradually develop individual and national liberties, and break one by one the weapons of oppression. It was a sudden bound out of the dept'is of tyranny into the blaze of frantic license. The people were ready for this change. and only this. They had drank to the dregs all the bitterness of human misery, of denial of all the rights of citizenship, of the burdens of heavy and uneship, of the burdens of heavy and unequal taxation, of enforced military service for the costly, ambatious, unnecessary wars of their sovereigns, of the cruel-sary wars of their sovereigns, of the price. ties, insolence and oppression of the privileged classes, of the deafear turned to throwing off the British yoke, and the participation of the French themselves in that achievement, not only infused some new ideas of liberty but courage and desperation to effect their own liber-
